

ALL IN THE FAMILY

The next generation is now leading the charge at Martha's Vineyard Construction Company.

Recently, Colin Whyte, founder of Martha's Vineyard Construction Company, stepped down as president, leaving his daughters, Hilary Moore and Alison Thompson in charge of the construction firm. Both Moore and Thompson have been involved in the company for several years, working with their special group of employees on an array of unique residential projects.

Joining the company five years ago as the office manager, Hilary Moore discovered her passion for the family business. "I realized I had the skillset and assets to take this and run," says Moore, now president of the firm. "And I wanted to continue my father's success."

As construction is booming on Martha's Vineyard, Moore and Whyte have experienced substantial growth. In response to the continued success of the past few years, the duo has plans in the works to launch a property management arm of the firm which will cater to the needs of their clients.

Whyte is still involved doing consulting and working with longstanding clients. "I'm available as much as they need me," he says. "I never planned for my daughters to someday take over the business so it's a wonderful feeling."
